

A great majority of traders and investors start thinking about their action only after the fact. Until the moment their buy or sell order is done, they are fearful that the levels which seem so attractive will disappear even if they delay one more minute. However, shortly afterwards, they start wondering whether it was a wise decision.

You can and should avoid such impulsive actions. Especially when your proposed (or current) exposure is significant.

You now have an opportunity to discuss your plan with a person who has very many years of experience dealing with several financial markets. Whether it is a stock, commodity or FX, you owe it to yourself to get an independent opinion of where we are in the cycle. Yes, all markets move in cycles, even if that term is esoteric.

So, the next time you plan to take a big exposure, (or exit a big exposure whether at a profit or loss), take a moment and consider what is said above as well as in wavetimes.com/consulting.
